The system will not give instructions, you need to find your own destination based on the goals offered by the system, at a certain distance. Beginning in the 19th century, literacy tests were used in the process of voter registration in the southern U.S. states by tending to separate Black voters. In 1917, with the passing of the Immigration Act, literacy tests were also included in the US immigration process, and they are still in use today. Historically, literacy testing has served to derail racial and ethnic departures in the U.S. Literacy test being introduced into the voting process in the South with Jim Crow's laws. These are state and local laws and statutes enacted by southern states and borders in the late 1870s to deny Black Americans the right to vote in the South following Reconstruction (1865-1877). They are designed keeping White and Black people isolated, to crack down on Black voters, and to keep Black people subjugated, undermine the 14th and 15th Constitutional Amendments. Despite the ratification of the 14th Amendment in 1868, granting citizenship to all persons born or arranged naturally in the United States, which includes people formerly enslaved, and The 15th amendment in 1870, which specifically gave Black Americans the right to vote, the South and border states continued to find ways to keep racism minorities from voting. They used electoral fraud and violence to intimidate Black American voters and created Jim Crow's legislation to promote racial isolation. For 20 years after Reconstruction, Black Americans lost many of the legal rights it had acquired during the Reconstruction. With Plessy v. Ferguson's Casey (1896), the U.S. Supreme Court effectively undermined the protection of Black Americans by providing authenticity to Jim Crow's law. In this case, the Supreme Court maintains that public facilities for Black and White people can be separate but equal. Following this decision, it soon became legal across the South that public facilities had to be separate. Many changes made during the Reconstruction proved soon, with the Supreme Court continuing to uphold discrimination and racial isolation in its decision, thus giving the southern state free to impose literacy tests and all manner of voting restrictions on prospective voters, discriminating against Black voters. But racism is not merely a recurrence in the South. While Jim Crow Laws is a Southern phenomenon, the sentiment behind them is a national one. There is a racial revival in the North as well as and belief among White people across the country, and internationally, that Reconstruction is a mistake. Some states, such as Connecticut, used literacy tests in the mid-1800s to keep Irish immigrants from voting, but southern states did not use literacy tests until after Reconstruction in 1890. Disariat by the federal government, this test was well used in the 1960s. They are given ostensibly to test the ability of voters to read and write, but in reality they are designed to decriminalize against Black Americans and sometimes poor White voters. Since then, at that time, 40% to 60% of Blacks are letters, compared to 8% to 18% of Whites, these tests have different racial effects. The southern states also impose other standards, all of which have been set by arbitrary test administrators. Favor those who own property, or have a grandfather who has been able to vote (grandfather's clause); people who have good character, and those who pay the poll tax. Due to these impossible standards, out of the 130,334 Black voters registered in Louisiana in 1896, only 1% could pass the state's new rules eight years later. The administration of literacy testing is unfair and discriminatory. If an administrator wants someone to pass, they can ask a simple question—for example, Who is the president Company? Although the same officers can require higher standards of Black people, even requiring that they answer each Correct. It's up to the test administrators whether a prospective voter passes or fails, and even a well-educated Black man, he will most likely fail, because the test was created with failure as a goal. Literacy tests were not declared unconstitutional in the South until 95 years after the 15th Amendment was ratified, through the passage of the Voting Rights Act of 1965. Five years later, in 1970, Congress abolished literacy tests and discriminatory voting practices across the country, and as a result, the number of registered Black American voters increased dramatically. In 2014 a group of Harvard University students were asked to take the 1964 Louisiana Literacy Test to raise awareness of voting discrimination. These tests are the same as those given in other Southern states since Reconstruction to potential voters who can't prove they have a fifth-class education. To be able to vote, one had to get past all 30 questions in 10 minutes. All students failed under those conditions because the test was intended to fail. The questions have nothing to do with the U.S. Constitution and are completely nonsense. In the late 19th century, many people wanted to restrict the influx of immigrants to the United States due to increased presentation and industrial problems such as congestion, housing shortages and jobs, and urban squalor. Currently, the idea of using literacy tests to control the number of migrants able to enter the United States, especially from southern and eastern Europe, has been formed. However, it takes those who support this approach many years to try to convince lawmakers and others that immigrants are the cause of many american social and economic maladies. Finally, in 1917, Congress passed the Immigration Act, also known as the Literacy Act (and the Asian Barred Zones Act), which includes literacy tests that are still a necessity to be US citizens today. The Immigration Act demands those over the age of 16 and can read some languages must read the word 30-40 to show they are capable of reading. Those entering the U.S. to avoid religious persecution from their home countries do not have to pass these tests. Literacy tests that are part of the Immigration Act of 1917 include only a few languages available to immigrants. This means that if their native language is not included, they cannot prove they are literate and denied entry. Beginning in 1950, immigrants can legally only take literacy tests in English, thus limiting those who can enter the United States. In addition to demonstrating the ability to read, write, and speak English, immigrants also need to display knowledge about Foner's history, government, and civic, Supreme Court and Reconstruction History and Vice Versa, Columbia Law Review, November 2012, 1585-1606.
